Russ Davis has spent the past three decades engaged in the project of improving the public education system. Despite struggling in academic settings, Russ developed a deep affinity for the public school system, and at age 19 became the then-youngest school district Chief Information Officer in his home state of Mississippi. He moved on to work in both public and private sectors, giving him a clear view of the challenges and opportunities facing school districts. Russ then left public service in 2010 to build the team and products that would eventually become SchoolStatus. He was inspired to create a company to help students and educators at all levels across the system

Russ champions trust, innovation and expertise with a leadership approach focused on instilling these values in all of the solutions his teams create. He has achieved his vision of developing a platform to improve educators' lives and the experiences of their community, offering effective two-way communication tools for families, centralized services for oversight and easy reporting, effective ways to address absenteeism, and attentive considerations for diverse voices within districts. Russ has cultivated a company of robust leaders poised to collaboratively navigate the future of education.
